Software

One of the broadest collections at the Physical Archives is the software collection. With formats ever-changing, the collection includes a variety of obsolete media that are often made accessible through emulation on the Internet Archive. Individuals with personal collections of specific programs, media types, or eras of software often donate their collections so they can be preserved. We also receive donations from institutions dedicated to preserving technological history.

Federal Depository Library Designation

The Internet Archive is proud to be counted among the newest members of the Federal Depository Library Program, or FDL P, an initiative that ensures the public has free access to government publications and information. The Internet Archive Library has been designated a depository for the Internet Archive's mission to provide "Universal access to all knowledge." It is the culmination of years of existing collaborations and partnerships with FDL P libraries.

Becoming a member of the Federal Depository Library Program, we're officially part of the national network that provides the public with free access to government publications. That means we can now acquire, preserve, and share even more official government documents—further expanding our collections and strengthening public access to government information.
